It can also be run on Windows (for that you'll have to download "relay2me") but it's not very useful outside of that platform. You can use it for sending links to people or very short messages. A: If you are willing to pay, I would recommend using Slack or Basecamp, both of which are platforms that are geared towards working with a group of people. Slack is a web-based, web-hosted service and Basecamp is a web-based application. The concept is that you can sign-up for a free account and invite your co-workers. Once you have signed-up, you can create your own channels, or people you wish to invite, as well as create your own work groups. You then get your own channel where people in your organization can comment, chat, etc. I have not used either, but they both seem to be fairly popular and googling them should give you more information. Ferrari have had a difficult season, they've been relying on a competitive car from other teams, and they're not doing so well at all. But, you know, let's just throw in some perspective here. The pole position this year has gone to Ferrari. In four consecutive years, Ferrari has won the opening race of the season. In fact, this year's first race in Australia, they won. Not many 2edc1e01e8
